

Cultural Awareness Training

For primary care providers

Providing good quality health service through culturally appropriate engagement.

As part of Northern Queensland Primary Health Network's (NQPHN's) First Nations Continuous Quality Improvement (CQI) Program, all primary care providers are invited to attend face-to-face Cultural Awareness Training.

Facilitated by Cultural Educator, Henry Neill.

Learning outcomes:

- identify how personal experiences impact on everyday life
- dispel common assumptions and negative stereotypes
- build awareness that although Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities share some similarities, they are two different cultures with their own cultural beliefs and understandings
- understand the importance of historical impacts on communities
- build awareness of the elements of effective and equitable service
- understand the importance of self-determination
- build awareness of community organisations that are key to local history, self-determination efforts, and strengthening services.

This training aligns with RACGP standard C2.1 – respectful and culturally appropriate care.
